Tuberculosis (TB) is the leading cause of death worldwide from a single infectious agent. The widespread adoption of directly observed treatment short course (DOTS) as the standard of care for TB dramatically has reduced the case fatality rate, but low treatment adherence has contributed to the emergence of multidrug-resistant TB and drug-resistant TB. Although several studies have attempted to identify determinants of adherence to TB treatment, few have examined neighbourhood social capital, an important feature of a neighbourhood that could be associated with treatment outcome. Using data from the 2005 Peru Demographic and Health Survey (DHS), we examine the relationship between neighbourhood social capital and adherence to TB treatment. The study uses data collected during a nationally representative survey that included 2946 persons living in 55 districts sampled from a sampling frame of all districts in Peru (n = 165). The main outcome measure is adherence to TB treatment in the six months following a TB diagnosis, which was indicated by negative smear tests on two consecutive sputum samples. Using logistic regressions, we find that a one standard deviation increase in neighbourhood social capital is associated with a significant increase in the odds of adherence to TB treatment by 2.49 (pQ: Find the same word before or after a string I'm using a PHP based CMS where I can view the database contents.
