It uses a layer-based editing system that enables creating and manipulating raster images and supports transparency. Adobe uses a proprietary JPEG format that is the default format for JPEG image files. For professional photographers, Lightroom is the standard editing program. It's been upgraded and modernized several times since its original release. It has become faster, more intuitive, and easier to use than its predecessors. Adobe Lightroom also has an app for iOS and Android called Lightroom Mobile. Q: Is it appropriate to include your institution's public Facebook page in your literature review? I am an undergraduate student working on a literature review for which I plan to use facebook posts and blogs as my primary sources. I would like to include my institution's facebook page in my literature review however I am concerned with potential violation of copyright and general image-related issues, even if the information I use is in public domain. I ask this question because of the fact that my institution's page has over 23,000 followers and most of the information I am planning to use on my paper is already posted on their page. And to some extent, the page is meant to be more like a reflection of our institution as a whole. A: There's a lot of literature on how to use images in a scholarly context, and that includes copyright. I've read a couple of web pages about copyright violations that explain the ins and outs of using images without permission, and one of those web pages mentions that the copyright owner can require the whole web page to be removed. Why would one do that? First, it would be a violation of the student's right to academic freedom. The purpose of this web page is to promote the university, its programs, its faculty and its students. It contains the university's character. The university wants to make sure that it remains as such. Second, the university has a very valuable brand name. If it would be shown that the university is somewhat corrupt (for example, if the student's paper reveals that the researcher was paid by a company that doesn't want the university to promote its product), the brand name would be harmed. It would be unlikely for the university to remain unaffected by this, and if this would hurt the university's brand so much that the university would not accept the PhD student into its postdocs, this may come to the attention of the (academic) society that decides on the student's acceptance to a postdoc. Third, a paper that is shown to be dubious because of dubious facts on this web page might be attributed to the university. If, for example, the paper mentions X as a teaching method that is typical for the university, it might be assumed that the university approves of X, even though the university is against X. Therefore I think it would be safe to say that the university does not want to be associated with any content that is found on this web page. The university wants to help its students and
