Diabetic nephropathy is one of the most serious complications of diabetes. It is characterized by microalbuminuria and progressive loss of renal function. The pathogenesis of this complication is multifactorial and is related to abnormalities of renal hemodynamics and of the glomerular filtration barrier. The recent identification of bradykinin as a mediator of angiotensin-dependent hypertension and proteinuria has provided new insights into the pathophysiology of diabetic nephropathy. Here, we briefly review our own studies on bradykinin in diabetes mellitus.
