Oral histopathological evaluation of the gingival tissues in smokers and non-smokers. This research aimed to evaluate the epithelial and subepithelial connective tissue in the gingival tissues of smokers and non-smokers. Forty individuals (20 smokers, 20 non-smokers) were selected for this study. Their periodontal status was clinically assessed. Partial gingival biopsies were obtained from the facial and lingual sides of the teeth. The tissue was processed, stained and examined by a single blind observer using a light microscope. Qualitative and quantitative evaluations were performed. The difference between the gingival tissues between smokers and non-smokers was statistically significant for all assessed variables. The gingival epithelium was significantly thinner for smokers than non-smokers. The gingival connective tissue of smokers was seen as being thicker than that of non-smokers. Smokers had more exposed collagen fibers than non-smokers. Smokers had greater numbers of inflammatory cells than non-smokers. Smokers had fewer areas that showed rete peg-like pattern. The oral tissues of smokers showed more severe changes than non-smokers, suggesting that these results were adversely affected by the smoking habit.
