The Journey to Glory

Today, all the games on an Xbox console are owned and managed by one person.

With Xbox Live, however, great things are possible. One gamer can give his friends an amazing experience and share his or her gaming achievements with the world. One gamer can unite friends by creating a "Game Club" for the ultimate challenge, and Gamers can discover local players worthy of gameplay.

What's New (NOT RETAIL DAMAGED):

- Additions to build mode, creating the best stadium of all time. Check out the animation video below for more detail.
- New Be A Pro feature as well as an improved stats system in the party scene

I enjoyed the game, but they could've improved the engine and AI. They also could've made better decisions on the new signings.Q: How do I get a different color of light to shine through? Hello and thanks for reading! I'm an absolute beginner in Blender and I'm wondering if someone could help me with this problem. I've been trying to make a simple sequence of lighting but I just can't seem to get the right light color. I know that I can change the color of the point light by using the color control in the properties panel under the lights tab but this seems like the wrong solution. I want something that looks like this: How can I achieve this? A: You can use the Raytrace option in the render properties. Set the Background color to Color Ramp and then in the color ramp you can choose a color. Another option is to make a Multigroup with a darker background color and an emissive object in the foreground. This will give a soft lighting in the foreground which is actually a reflection of the background color instead of its own light source. To make it more transparent, you can add a black background to the emissive object and use a transparent material for the background color. Then the object will seem to be painted over the background while still giving a light effect. A: If you want the light to shine through for this to work, you'll need to use the
