Q: iota++ in a function via initialization I would like to initialize a variable inside the function main using the C++11 iota in order to create a class that is unique every time the code is executed. E.g: `uint i = 0; void f(uint) { iota[i++]; } int main() { f(7); uint i = 1; iota[i++]; return 0; }` I obtain the following error: identifier 'iota' is undefined A: iota is an aggregate, and that's part of why it doesn't work. Try a different approach; consider using `std::array` or `std::vector` instead. `struct iota { int i = 0; }; int main() { std::array iota(7); iota[0].iota++; }` If you wish to initialize with values, instead do it outside of the main function. `struct iota { int i = 0; }; int main() { static`
