The aim of the study was to evaluate the effect of chronic opioid exposure on the functional properties of the human cardiac microvasculature, which is a reservoir of the opioid receptors. Cultured human cardiac microvascular endothelial cells (CMEC) were pre-exposed to 10 µM morphine for 10 days and then evaluated for morphine-induced inhibition of cell growth, production of nitric oxide (NO), release of prostacyclin (PGI₂) and endothelial-derived hyperpolarizing factor (EDHF) under physiological conditions. Morphine-induced non-competitive inhibition of cell proliferation was reduced by 10 days of pre-exposure to morphine. On the contrary, a functional tolerance was observed for morphine-induced inhibition of NO and PGI₂ release, whereas EDHF production was unaffected. Finally, morphine-induced inhibition of NO release and PGI₂ production persisted after removal of morphine from the cell culture medium, but a significantly reduced EDHF release was observed. In conclusion, the present study shows that chronic opioid exposure induces a functional tolerance in human cardiac microvascular endothelial cells, which could translate into the reduced microvascular vascular reactivity often observed in chronic opioid addicts.
