Full list of games wich found in our database :So, in August, NASA went public with the news that it was planning to send a team of astronauts to the moon in 2024, and then return them safely to Earth the following year. The idea of colonization was, as we all know, controversial, and so what better place than a town in Florida to host the future of American society? In a previous article, I explored some of the reasons why, after four years of orbit and no TV cameras or internet access, we will be visiting the moon for the first time since 1972. Hopefully you'll forgive me for not going into them here; but one thing to note is that lunar history is a little strange. First off, as far as we know, man's first landing on the moon was by accident. In 1961, the Soviets landed an unmanned spacecraft onto the moon on a ballistic trajectory, and it returned to earth on splashdown in the Pacific Ocean. NASA's Project Mercury, which had already been successfully sending people into space, had a hard time convincing the Soviets to back down from the claim. The argument was that their manned trip was a more valuable achievement than the Soviet's unmanned landing, which was being sponsored by the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and funded by Brazil and France. NASA wanted to establish a lunar landing to be the first, and went about its planning with an impartiality that was almost forced. The whole mission was rather sketchy, with no specifics on what NASA was going to do once on the moon, and little funding. Apollo was, at least in part, an attempt to prove that America was still
