IEM maintains an ever-growing archive of automated airport weather observations from around the world! These observations are commonly referred to as "ASOS" or . Automated Station Analysis".

When the Los Angeles airport weather service, namely ASOS, was incorporated into IEM, we inherited these observations from the meteorologists who had made them and made the data available to the entire globe. IEM is now a huge collection of weather and environmental data available to the scientific community (see <http://www.ihw.ieu.edu/IMEMO>) endoscopic evaluation. To evaluate the utility of prophylactic ureteroneocystostomy in women with retrograde type II endometriosis. A retrospective case review of 43 women with persistent lower urinary tract symptoms after retrograde type II endometriosis therapy, who were found to have a fistula and underwent either open or laparoscopic treatment of the endometriosis. The diagnosis was confirmed with cystoscopy and rectal probe examination. Patients were eligible for a primary retrograde uterovesical fistula repair (procedure described by McDonald) only if the fistula was not associated with concurrent lumbosacral disease. Women with active endometriosis were treated after an initial suprapubic cystourethroscopy to determine appropriate retrograde surgical approach. Each patient was evaluated at 6 weeks, 6 months, and annually thereafter for a minimum of 6 months, to determine the success of repair. Four patients failed the repair and were excluded from study evaluation. All other patients underwent successful endoscopic repair with ureteroneocystostomy without complications. Lower urinary tract symptoms that include urgency, frequency, and nocturia did not predict failure of repair. The most common complaint in women with recurrent lower urinary tract symptoms is bother, which is present in most patients with retrograde type II endometriosis. In this study, recurrent lower urinary tract symptoms after retrograde type II endometriosis therapy failed to predict endoscopic failure of the primary repair.
